Shall the Policy of Hate Continue to Prevail?

The vital issue in this campaign is one of unionism against sectionalism, the issue raised in every campaign since the war. The republican party has always been and now is a sectional organization. When it exhibited any strength in the southern states it was during the period of reconstruction, and at a time when the intelligent and better portion of the people refused to take part in politics. Since they began to exercise the right of suffrage themselves, the republican party gradually decreased in strength until it is practically obliterated in all the old slave states. Its existence there at all was only temporary. To-day it is confined to the northern states, and is hence purely a sectional party. It has practically ignored the existence of the federal union by its appeals to its voters of the north to sustain that party in its bitter attacks upon the south, ignoring that broad spirit that should reach out and cover the whole country in its grasp. At a meeting of the leaders in New York the other day to consider what, if anything should be done in the southern states it was resolved to make no effort there. Why? Because if one or more should happen to give its vote to Garfield, they would lose their old cry of a "solid south." Their existence as a sectional party might cease.

There are other and more important issues than those of hate, of sectionalism and practical disunion. But suggest the necessity of revision of the tariff, and the response comes: Behold a solid south! Refer to the currency question, and we are met by the states: Behold a solid south! Anything offered to enhance the material prosperity of the country brings forth the stereotyped phrase: Behold the solid south! If an idea is broached that the government might be conducted in a sectional party it is continued if at all by appeals to out-vote a "solid south." It feeds upon hate and fattens upon outrage. It gloats over assassination provided it occur in the "solid south." It does not want peace nor friendship; it prefers to preach the gospel of hatred for upon it thrives, and is the essence of its being.

The republican party will pay liberally from now until election for a first-class outrage committed anywhere between Mason and Dixon's line. Their success in the coming campaign depends largely upon loss of life or serious injury to one or more persons in the old slave states. An assassination of a single colored person would undoubtedly be worth thousands of votes to them. To this extremity, shameful though it be, is the party reduced. Said General Hancock:

"The war for the union was successfully closed more than fifteen years ago; all classes of our people must share the blessings of the good and beneficent government in its perpetuity and in the proper administration of public affairs. We are in a state of profound peace as one people who have common interests."

What nobler teachings can be uttered than these voiced by our leader? Are they not patriotic? Will they not carry there is no sectional spirit to be inferred from them.

In that unity settled forever by the war, we ought to rise above bickering and quarrels fomented by republican policy, and move forward in the march of progress. The genius of our people is progress, business and energetic life, and the party that stands in their road will go down before the march of events. No nation can thrive while one-half the people seeks to persecute the other half. Garfield himself said in congress not long ago that

"The man who attempts to get up a political excitement in this country on the old sectional issues will find himself without a party and without support."

Mr. Garfield stands to-day as the representative of hate and sectionalism. Let us hope that his prediction will find himself without a party and without support. The question is thus broadly presented and easy of comprehension: Garfield represents a portion of the country, bounded by the lakes on the north and sectionalism on the south; Hancock represents the whole country.

Democratic State Convention.

The democratic state convention assembled in Detroit on Thursday of last week. Chairman of the state central committee O. M. Barnes of Lansing called the meeting to order and introduced Rev. Mr. Hickey who offered prayer.

On assuming temporary chairmanship Col. W. D. Wilkins of Detroit addressed the convention. He said:

"I thank you very sincerely for the compliment you have conferred upon me by nominating me to preside over the preliminary deliberations, a compliment which I feel assured is not conferred upon me personally, but upon the state of Michigan as a whole. I have the honor, in part, to represent in your convention, the citizens of this city, the place of which is so large attended by the leaders of the republican party, and I am proud to be numbered among the men who have stood by the good cause through good report and evil report, through adversity and disaster, through the darkest and gloomiest of our country, and even through persecution, with courage unblanching and hope unflinching and faith unshaken. I have never with despair. (Renewed applause.) And now, when the faith and courage which have burned long and so brightly within us are about to be crowned with the glorious meed of victory, when with dissensions banished and union and confidence restored, we are about to inaugurate the glorious name of Hancock (loud cheers), and have met here to close up our ranks for the battle, how can we feel otherwise than profoundly grateful that the faith that was established by our ancestors and has descended from generation to generation, with its human equality and in absolute equal rights for all Americans under common constitution—that faith that means democracy, has been kept alive, and that it burns now, as ever, with the fervor and strength of a religion. (Long continued applause.)"

The address elicited for consultation and comparison of views, and to place in nomination before the freemen of our noble state those men who should represent our views and our principles. We are to speak, therefore, by deeds and not by words. The time for our speeches shall be brief, and we shall show reason to our neighbors, to show reason for the faith that is in us. (Cheers.) Then will follow the time for rejoicing. Since they began to exercise the right of suffrage themselves, the republican party gradually decreased in strength until it is practically obliterated in all the old slave states. Its existence there at all was only temporary. To-day it is confined to the northern states, and is hence purely a sectional party. It has practically ignored the existence of the federal union by its appeals to its voters of the north to sustain that party in its bitter attacks upon the south, ignoring that broad spirit that should reach out and cover the whole country in its grasp.

Our State Ticket.

The convention at Detroit was the reverse of that held at Jackson. At the former, offices sought the men, at the latter, men sought the offices. The former was free from lobbyists, whereas as Jackson overlooked with them. The republican candidate for governor Mr. Jerome, is a creature of combinations and rings. Mr. Holloway, our candidate was nominated without effort at caucus-jacking or button-holing, and is a farmer of wide and excellent repute.

As for the candidates who appeared at Jackson for a candidate identified with the agricultural interests of the state and failed to secure the person of their choice, are honest, they will vote for Mr. Holloway.

The remaining candidates are gentlemen of character who, if elected will administer the duties of their respective offices with credit to themselves and the public. Mr. Albert Crane of Ypsilanti, candidate for member of the state board of education, stands high in the legal fraternity of this portion of the state, is a gentleman of high character, and would grace any position to which the people might call him.

Political.
—Hancock and English Clubs are being formed in every section of Paterson, N. J., some wards having two or three clubs. The enthusiasm among the Democrats is unprecedented. Of the eighty members of the Hancock Veteran Legion, one-third are Republican soldiers who will vote for Hancock for President, but on the rest of the ticket will vote for the Republican nominees.

—Since Hancock's letter to Gen. Sherman has been made public, the Republican cry, "His thing but a soldier," is being taken up in every section of the state. The enthusiasm among the Democrats is unprecedented. Of the eighty members of the Hancock Veteran Legion, one-third are Republican soldiers who will vote for Hancock for President, but on the rest of the ticket will vote for the Republican nominees.

—The following resolution, which failed to reach the committee in time to be incorporated in its report, was offered by W. Stearns, and adopted with applause:
"We hereby reiterate, as we shall at the coming convention, our grateful remembrance of the devoted and noble lives of the living soldiers and sailors, through whose sacrifices and blood the republic was preserved, and by whose votes its perpetuity may be maintained by the election of our most illustrious leader, Gen. Hancock."

V. H. Smith, of Ionia, offered the following, which was adopted:
"Resolved, That the State Central Committee be instructed in calling the next State Convention to appoint delegates to the several counties according to the total vote at the gubernatorial election of next preceding such call, making proper provision for the representation of new counties."

The resolution was unanimously adopted.
Willits enters the canvass as a machine candidate hoisted upon his party by the enforcement of the gag rule in Hillsdale; purchase of the Washtenaw delegation from Childs with promises of official favor backed by a letter from DeGolyer-Garfield; with Lenawee Co. stubbornly refusing to accord him a unanimous nomination in spite of his actual majority, and with the astonishing fact staring him in the face being bitterly opposed by 10 out of 12 delegates from his own county. Handicapped by very opposition in his own ranks in the very beginning of the congressional race, must indeed be a cheering outlook for the success of the third term. The result of the Manchester convention will render the aspect less pleasing, and we feel in our bones that Edwin Willits is cherishing a hope of re-election which will be completely demolished long before the idea of Nov.—Monroe Democrat.

Republicans assert that General Hancock was educated at a soldier's camp, and having been a soldier from early life, not and cannot be a statesman. By this supposed logical conclusion, they say he is not fitted for the high office of president. It should not be forgotten that Washington, Jackson, Harrison and Taylor were soldiers. Twelve years in congress Garfield has had ample opportunity to distinguish himself and acquire the distinction of being a statesman. What has he done to merit the title? What act has he originated to demonstrate the possession of statesmanlike qualities? Will opponents please name one?

Col. Forney of Philadelphia, a republican from the birth of the party until recently, and having a wide acquaintance with public men, says Garfield is a sneak, a jobber, and an impostor.
Ole Bull, the violinist, is dead.

The Exact Cause-Taker.

The most precise and thorough census-enumerator is just now passing through a mining camp in Southern Nevada and he is having a hard time of it.

As an illustration, he called at an old proprietor's cabin the other morning, and taking out his big blank book, proceeded to put the miner through the entire category of questions about as follows:
"What street do you live on?"
"Don't live on no street; I live yer in the rocks."
"What's the number of your house?"
"Asker, what's that?"
"The number of my rickin'" quizzed the miner, "is No. 1, I reckon."
"What's your name?"
"Bill Lamar."
"Are you white, black, mulatto, Chinese or Indian?"
"Wal, now, said Bill slightly ruffled and rising, "I don't know what yer drivin' at, stranger, but I want yer to get out of my cabin. I've got to hess the reputation of bein' white."
Still puzled, the Government agent continued:
"Are you sick or temporarily disabled?"
"Sick? Disabled?" roared Bill, dancing wildly before the young man with the big book, "you blank fool!"
"Blind?"
"Not much!" hissed the miner, with eyes flashing.

Wild with rage and glaring like a madman at this question, Bill shook his fist and the agent's nose just as the latter looked on with an innocent look followed up his queries with—
"Injure, crippled, bed-ridden?"
"The way too much!" Bill's fist came down on the census-taker's unfortunate head like a rock-hammer, while at the same time his number fourteen brogan kicked the agent's feet out from under him. The fellow's coat-tails as lifted him clear out doors, book and all.

The census-enumerator gave one glance back at the advancing form of the most dangerous looking human being he had ever rested on and started for a gulch a hundred yards away, where he hid himself. His trousers and shirt were on a rock, opened his great book and after the name of "Bill Lamar" wrote the words:
"Blinded, crippled or otherwise disabled."
"No?"
"Yes?"

A. L. NOBLE.

MEDICINAL.

MRS. BENTON'S NIECE.

BY MARY D. BARTLES.

NERVOUS DEBILITY.

GRAY'S SPECIFIC MEDICINE.

"Here, Julie," replied a very friendly-looking, very concited, very frank-looking young gentleman, from the piazza of Mrs. Benton's boarding-house.

"I'm going to Kate Brownlee's. Would you like to call?"

"No," emphatically.

"Why not?"

"Does she live here in Danvers?"

"Yes, Mrs. Benton's niece. A pleasant acquaintance here. Come, you indolent dandy, unless that gate, if you please. I wish Adele would even go to this little distance; but you little know, sir, what a very pretty place Mr. Brownlee has, and I want you to go in to the post-office for me."

"But why do you call anywhere here in Danvers?" inquired Mr. Eril, as he walked with his cousin, Lester, along the village street.

"I don't care to have these people for my acquaintances."

"No," said Julie, "but we are going over to the farm-house, and I want Kate Brownlee to go with us."

"But Miss Kate Brownlee, when invited, informed Julie that she had made a partial engagement to go to Rossville on Wednesday, and so with this she declined to go to the farm-house."

"Absurd!" said Julie, indignantly. "Gerald—Mr. Eril is looking at some sea-shells on the terrace—I'm so sorry. Mamma wants Kate to go with us in the carriage to Talbot's and she will go."

"I think you spoke of Rossville, Miss Brownlee," said Gerald, quietly.

"Yes," said Kate, "I was going there."

"Then, Julie, we can all go over to Rossville instead of Talbot's. Why not?"

"Miss Brownlee does not object?"

"No, indeed," said Julie. "Rossville is too much like Danvers. The forest's gardens are the only attractions there. Talbot's is a place where people go to see the city and the city and in neighboring places go to dine or lunch. The scenery is fine—the house has pleasant piazzas, and pretty grounds. Now, Kate, we may call for you on Wednesday."

"I have a letter from Mr. Clark and Mr. Rice if she did not go to Rossville with him? She had not accepted his invitation. Clark lives in Danvers—these people were here only for the summer."

"I concluded that she would go to Talbot's—not to Rosville."

"But Clark Rice did care when he received Kate's note informing him that she had not previously accepted his invitation, since now he had to go to Rosville, and he was so glad to see her."

"Clarkson was proprietor of the village store, and post-master of Danvers—and he was building up a fine business there, having planned by a skillful architect, and it was finished in quite artistic style. He had hoped Kate Brownlee might one day preside there as Mrs. Rice—but now he began to feel that it was no longer a business that she preferred the society of Mr. Eril to his own (for Clarkson's cousin Maggie, had told him that Kate was going with Mr. Eril and the Lesters). I am so glad to have the pleasure of seeing her, and I am so glad to see Mrs. Lester, when they were on their way to Talbot's. Mrs. Althrop did not come because she expected the Blaikies, who are coming to board at your house."

"Oh, it is twice as pleasant having all's attention and complimentary remarks made Miss Kate longest quite a glance towards Clarkson Rice's store when they passed it in the carriage, and so she did not notice that Clarkson was standing near his carriage about to start alone for Rosville and she had quite forgotten that she intended going to Rosville with him."

Arrived at the farm, Gerald carried Kate's extra shawl, and walked beside her along the flower-bordered path to the farm-house door, and said to her, "I wish you would be so very pleasant that he hoped the afternoon drive home would be equally so."

"Why! there's Maggie Rice," exclaimed Kate. "I didn't know that she was coming. And there is Jane Forbes too."

"Oh, some of the village people are here," said Mr. Eril, indifferently, but the majority of the party are Danvers from the city—not residents of Danvers."

"I didn't suppose you were coming," said Mr. Eril.

"Because I knew Clarkson Rice was going to the house and I had my own roses," said Julie, who had noticed that Kate generally had a bunch of flowers in the sitting room at her home, after Clarkson had been to Rosville.

"Are roses here as well as at Rosville?" remarked Mr. Eril to Kate.

"Shall I place this chair for you, Miss Brownlee, near Julie, in the other part of the piazza?" and even Kate observed the way in which he carefully avoided an introduction to her acquaintances.

Indeed, the Lesters, and Mr. Eril, and Kate formed quite a little party by themselves on one part of the piazza.

"Who is this Clarkson Rice?" inquired Mr. Eril, in a condescending manner.

"The post-master," said Julie. "I go to his store for letters. A young man, very well acquainted with the Danvers. Is he here to-day?" she inquired.

"No," said Mr. Eril, "and I want Miss Brownlee to forget Danvers and the storekeeper there for awhile. Have you relatives in New York, Miss Kate?"

Kate replied that she had not, and Julie said how sorry she was that they were not house-keeping. It would have been so pleasant to have Kate come to the city to visit them.

Kate was soon walking about the grounds with Mr. Eril and Julie, and she requested Miss Kate to inform them as to which were her special favorites among the flowers in bloom, as he wished to know before ordering a bouquet for her acceptance.

After luncheon, Mr. Eril went into the pleasant farm-house sitting-room (where Maggie Rice and Jane Forbes were glad to welcome her), but her stay was brief.

"Come out here, Kate darling," called Julie, from the piazza. "Mamma and I are so lonely without you, and Gerald has gone to order your bouquet from the flowers you selected."

"I don't seem to think that she has any Danvers acquaintances here to-day," said Julie Forbes. "The Lesters and Mr. Eril are very exclusively polite to Kate—and very haughty towards the rest of our party. Miss Julie Lester appears to recognize the occupants of that carriage, Maggie."

And there at the farm-house gate was sitting a young man, who was called by the intention of the 72-year-old and childless earl to marry Mrs. Lorelei, a widow of 36, whose husband fell in the Zulu war.

THE BEST FARMING REGION.

Early last spring a gentleman wrote to an eastern agricultural paper for a relation to the best location for establishing himself as a farmer. He stated that he had $50,000 in cash which he wished to invest in the business which he desired to pursue chiefly for profit and not for pleasure. His letter was published in the paper without note or comment.

His first installments of advice came from localities in the vicinity of Ithaca. He was informed by different persons that the best place in which to engage in farming was Long Island, New Jersey, the Mohawk valley in New York, the western slope of the Green mountains in Vermont, the northern portion of Maine, and the eastern part of Massachusetts. The authors of the various communications disagreed in most things, but they all agreed in advising that the best place for a man to go to for any portion of the sickly, over-late, late-ridden, labor-consumed, and unproductive South. They also united in advising that the best place for a man to go to for any portion of the sickly, over-late, late-ridden, labor-consumed, and unproductive South. They also united in advising that the best place for a man to go to for any portion of the sickly, over-late, late-ridden, labor-consumed, and unproductive South.

"I wish I was going in the carriage with you, Maggie," said Kate.

"We're waiting," called Julie, with much authority of manner, "and I wish you would bring your sun-umbrella, Kate. It's on the piazza downstairs."

Kate took the umbrella to Julie, and on the way home in the carriage, the Blaikies and their fashionable style were topics of conversation with Mrs. Lester and her daughter.
