Written for the COURIER. AMERICAN OIL-STONES.

Superior to the Imported Varieties—Where the Rock is Found—Cutting, Polishing and Shaping.

It may not be generally known, even among artisans using oil-stones, that instead of importing them, American made oil-stones are now exported largely to all foreign countries, including Australia, Egypt, Africa, and South Africa.

Previous to about the year 1857, this country was almost entirely dependent upon Turkey and Hindostan for the supply; although Welsh stones and the Norway rag-stone were used to some extent. Turkey stone, however, is rarely of uniform texture, while the Hindostan stone quickly fills with metal, and the other kinds named, general have some serious defect.

All the European varieties have, therefore, been superseded, in the markets of the world, by American oil-stones, as the latter not only possess far greater resisting properties, than those imported, but they are uniformly harder and finer, besides being more perfect; and for these reasons, they fulfill better than any others, the difficult requirements of an oil-stone.

As information regarding the rock—and the manufacture of oil-stones is rather meager—and so far as known, confined to one publication only of a technical character—the following particulars, gathered by the writer from a leading manufacturer of oil-stones in New York City, will not be devoid of interest.

Near the Hot Springs, Arkansas, is a tract of land about seven miles square, where the so-called Novaculite, or "whetstone" rock, is found in apparently inexhaustible quantities; and although the peculiarities of this stone were known to the Indians of that state, as long ago as the beginning of the present century, yet it was not until about the year 1851, that the rock was successfully worked for oil-stones.

There are two kinds of stone, the finer quality, known as Arkansas stone, is seldom found more than eight inches long without flaw, and it usually ranges from 10 to 50 pounds in weight, it is shipped from the quarries mostly in barrels; while the coarser kind, called Washita stone, is obtained in blocks weighing from 100 to 4,500 pounds. Both classes of stone are quarried at a depth of not less than ten feet below the surface, in order to avoid thin quartz veins as much as possible; quartz being harder than the surrounding stone, the latter is worn away more rapidly, thus leaving the surface so ridgy, lumpy and uneven as to render the oil-stones unfit for use.

They are in the market to some extent, but can be detected by dipping them in water, which causes the spots and quartz veins to become plainly discernible.

The Washita stone is chiefly used by carpenters and wood-workers, while the Arkansas variety is particularly well adapted for the use of dentists, engravers of metal, jewelers and watchmakers; also to sharpen small diamond saws, as well as for surgical and mathematical instruments, and for penknives and needles.

The cutting, polishing and shaping of oil-stones has grown to be quite an important industry, from a very small beginning; 50,000 pounds per month being the amount cut by one manufacturer in New York; but it is proper to state, however, that this is more than is being done by any other three concerns, in the same line put together—either at home or abroad.

Briefly described, the following is the process employed in cutting the stone: The fragments of each are packed upon the bed of the saw-frame. The saws, which are of soft iron, have a reciprocating motion, and at the end of every stroke descend at the beginning of the next stroke; and the sand and water which are thrown upon them flows down between the saw-edges and the stone below, and the sand, becoming imbedded in the metal cuts the stone as the saws move. Diamond pointed saws—which are generally used in cutting brown stone—would cut as much in twenty minutes as sand does in a day, but owing to the wonderful abrading property of the Arkansas and Washita stone, the diamond points are soon dulled, and are frequently either forced from their settings or broken—often both.

In cutting wheel-stones, the lower end of the shaft is made goose-shaped, so that it will cut into proper width; the wheel is cut by a soft iron, bent to form an arc of the circle it describes; the corner of the iron being bent inwards, so that it will cut under the same as it does with the straight saw.

After being sawed into slabs, the stones are piled under another gang of saws, which they are cut into proper widths; the ends are then cut in such a way as to avoid flaws and quartz veins. In cutting beveled surfaces the slab is held in an inclined position under the saw by means of plaster of Paris.

The finishing or polishing of oil-stones is done by pressing the stone upon a large horizontal cast-iron wheel or revolving table, covered with sand and water; this method being the same as that generally employed in polishing other kinds of stone.

The usual size of an oil-stone is eight inches long, two inches wide and about one and one-quarter inches in thickness. Both the Washita and Arkansas stones are also mounted in mahogany cases, for the use of amateurs, and are sold mostly in California and South America. Stone wheels made pointed and shaped as cylindrical and in the shape of triangular prisms, and are generally packed in small paper boxes. Special tools are also made for use on high temperature metals—such as rifle barrels and fine instruments—being very desirable in obviating waste of time in taking out and restoring the temper; to say nothing of the risk incurred by the operation.

Oil-stones four inches long, one-half inch wide, and requiring 128 pieces to make one thickly used inch, are some times finished; the labor alone, however, on such stones, reaching as high as $60 per pound. And so rare is a large piece of Arkansas rod without flaw, that the cost of a wheel-stone nine inches in diameter, would reach several hundred dollars.
