HALF-MAST.

Gov. Governor JOHN J. BAGLEY, died in San Francisco, July 27, 1881.

From the land far towards the sunset Came a message stern and brief, And the light of hope was quenched In a bitter flood of grief.

For his boat he cast his anchor On a fairer shore than this, Where no darkness dims the glory Of the sun of perfect bliss;

But the shadow of the specter Which laid its hand upon his heart, Reached unto us, his people, Of whom he was a part.

Hushed the eloquence which thrilled us, Cold the ever boueous hand That never closed to an appeal From the poorest of the land.

From the lofty and the lowly Come rare tributes to his worth,— Richer than the songs of conquerors, Better than all fame of earth.

For, though he climbed not up the heights Where the fabled ages glow, Yet he was a grander hero, His nobler grandeur—

A mission reaching far and wide Into poverty, A brotherhood which gathered all Of the good God's children in.

With a good soul plain and simple And all his faculties unclouded, Yet broad in his humanity, As the bonanzas level of God, He was a blessing in his way On the tolling and the poor.

And, though he comes no more among us, Yet shall his deeds and words, We shall miss him in the councils, And the children of the state, All will weep for him who loved them, With a love so strong and great.

But while all mourn, let us be glad, For which is nearest kin to pain, We mutely say, "God's will be done," For our loss is his great gain.

THE FREE ICE-WATER FOUNTAIN.

O blessed fountain in the fervid street, O draught of life in hot and sultry days, Unto us, bringing coolness with tired feet, Come wearily through sick and lazing days!

From striding elements the mother bears, In fevered arms the fevered, waiting child, And as it drinks and smiles she almost dares To hope for life, and in grief beguiled.

The children, with unchildish labor sick, Lift flushed faces to the dripping brink, The eager worker from the very thick Of toll and strife stiffs gladly for a drink.

And says, "God bless the crystal water cool!" The mother's water, cooled with water's, For sick and thirsty lips, for young and old, And cool the lips of fever and of toil.

Some healing angel standeth there, I think, And cries, "Come here!" from out his life, ho, turmoil, Slopingly and gives the children drink, And cool the lips of fever and of toil.

It was a blessing that, no treaty took, The cooling cup that has no taint of sin, 'Tis given for humanity's sweet sake; 'Tis one step toward the mark we take, And for return shall "thanks and usage" give.

GERALD MYRTLE-MORE'S ESCAPE.

Gerald Myrtle-More had known from his infancy, known and to the word may be used without ridicule by a crabbled old bachelor—loved. At the time of my story he was a tall, handsome young fellow of seven-and-twenty, sturdy of limb and stout of heart.

At his father's death, some five years previous, Gerald had come into possession of a good property. He had a comfortable speculation connected with the downfall of a certain bank, whose name has still an ugly favor on men's lips, had well-nigh ruined him. He lived alone with an old confidential housekeeper in a neat little house called, after the village, Ashdale Lodge. Here he was on the spot, looking after the wreck of his speculation, and trying to bring order out of monetary chaos. He was lonely, and I was lonely; and, moreover, as I was his chief assistant in the above-mentioned speculation, we were drawn much together. Of winter evenings—possibly after a brisk run with the Croxy hounds—we sat in my home, and talked and talked gossily and politics by the hour. Of late, however, I had noticed a change in him, and with the keen eye of a lawyer I tracked it to its cause: Gerald was in love.

Gerald Myrtle-More was certainly in love. I had made a diagnosis of the disease far too often to be misled. His visits were less frequent, and he was almost always absent-minded when he did come. I remarked great extremes in his dress; at one time he was wonderfully polished and precise, at another very lax. Then, too, I had caught him more than once in the streets of Ashdale talking very earnestly with Miss Trantor, an arrangement in pink and white with whose charms a good many young men seemed smitten. Naturally, I laughed at him, and equally, according to the rule, the laughing aggravated the symptoms. I was a dry, dry, dry, for another reason beyond the purely selfish one of losing a blithe-eyed friend. A strong presentment of evil lay upon me. Miss Trantor might conceivably be next door to an angel; but her father, Captain Trantor, of Hollies Hall, was best described as an avaricious autocrat. I knew him well; in an official capacity I had had many dealings with him, and had found his coldness only equalled by his pride, his inflexibility only overmastered by his greediness for gain. He had a certain reputation in the village as a money-lender, a veritable extortioner; and although his dignity kept it a secret, I had ample reason to believe it true. Solicitors are not accustomed to trust much to chance; but I would have wagered any day my whole professional reputation that Captain Trantor would never be brought to hear of a match between Gerald Myrtle-More and his daughter. In family, of course, Gerald was fully his equal; the Myrtle-Mores had been settled in Brakeshire for more than three centuries. But Gerald was poor and he was rich, and that alone the magnate of Hollies Hall would find to be an insuperable objection.

It was a dull leaden afternoon in early autumn, and the blinds were down in my easy room, the gas alight, the logs blazing. Gerald made no effort to seek the shade; he was long past the period of blushing self-consciousness. He stood upright, to the left of the fire-place, his firm white fingers grasping tightly a chair's back, his gray eyes seeking mine. I heard him to the end without an intermission, a concise avowal, wherein passion wore the dress of simple words.

"Millicent and I have been acquainted for long," he said. "We have met often, and she seems to favor my advances. It is with her father that the difficulty threatens. You know Capt. Trantor? I think he begins to suspect."

"Ah! As yet, then, you have not definitely enlightened him?"

"I have taken, up to this moment, no decisive step whatever; but I shall."

"And if he refuses?"

"If he denies me his consent, and Milly is still favorable, I shall persevere."

"She is Trantor's only child and a considerable heiress, no doubt, I said."

"A marriage with her father's goods would set your estate in order again, and many people—"

"With a gleam of scorn he broke my carefully adjusted words asunder."

"It is invariably money, filthy lucre!" he burst out. "The world has set up its idols—a great golden Moloch—and everybody is in a hurry to bow down; and the struggle is, who shall succeed in making the deepest obeisance. You are a lawyer, Parke, and like the rest. I ought to have remembered that."

"You will pardon me if I am a trifle less sentimental than a young gentleman in love," I replied, with a smile.

The storm was over, and the deep ocean calm in an instant. Gerald could see the difficulties of the situation every whit as well as I, and it was the embarrassment they caused that had led to the tiny ebullition.

"I apologize," he said simply. "Of late I fear I've been scarcely civil many times. I am edging toward the Babylon, and it worries me. Fate is against me, but—I'll conquer yet," and he began to stride slowly up and down the room.

"Nothing was to be gained by a blinking of the facts."

"Millicent Trantor is not of age; you are, comparatively speaking, a poor sultor; and her father—a tall, rich and hard man," Gerald, I said.

"He winced, but admitted at once my conclusions."

"You think that Captain Trantor will say 'No' in tones of thunder," he said, "unless the insoleness of the proposition takes his breath away. I fear so, too; but this discussion has at least cleared my mind, and before many days have passed, that question, at any rate, will be decided. I will first make quite sure of Milly (what a world of tenderness trembled about the name!) and then I will try her father. I am not exactly rich, as all Ashdale knows, since that crash; but I am a gentleman; I have health, honor, and brains; I can surely keep a wife, and time will help to free what remains of the old property around the Lodge."

"That is true," I said. "Our conversation now took a fresh turn, and we sat late."

I was searching my office pigeon-holes next morning for a missing document, when my clerk announced Captain Trantor. A moment more and he was before me, a tall, thin, grizzled man, with an eye like a hawk's and a mien continually hovering between a sneer and a frown. He returned my salutation as frigidly as usual and sat down. At first vaguely, and from association of thought, I wondered whether his errand had anything to do with my friend's case. I pried the card which he held in his hand, and lo! it was a note from Captain Trantor, going north; he had property beyond the Tweed, and wished my advice upon a plain matter of business, a dispute between a tenant and himself. Once again, and so far as a personal interview was concerned, for the last time, the ingrained selfishness of the man's heart was revealed to me. I pried the unknown Scotchman who had incurred his displeasure, and I made my advice of as mild a tone as possible. He took notes of all I said in a little red-backed pocket-book, thanked me, and departed. It was then the 8th of October.

"I shall be back on the 19th, or 20th at latest, Mr. Parke," he said, turning for an instant on the threshold; I will call on you as before, and if my request is not to have need to write to me, I will not have need to write to me."

I bowed and returned his "Good-morning."

Half a dozen days later Gerald and I met at a dinner party at the rectory. Mrs. Trantor and her daughter were there also, for the Reverend Eustace Bronne was a bright and shining light in our social firmament as well as in his oaken pulpit; his entertainments were invariably well attended and seemed to draw to the rectory, as of late evening. She found plenty of obsequious admirers, from the sleek-faced little curate to the pompous old squire of the Manor House. I watched her with this time keenly, critically, and gave my verdict in her favor. Her mother was a shy, sensible woman, who took but a languid interest even in the affairs of her own household, and who would no more have dreamed of defying her husband in a trivial matter than in a great one. Millicent exhibited, in her vivacity, a self-reliance and mild spirit of inquiry. She was slight, but of good figure; lovely to-night in a dress that both fitted her and was a tribute to good taste. She could sing and play as I had heard only one other country lass do; and that was with quite old-fashioned songs thirty years ago. Once or twice that evening I fancied that signals passed between Millicent Trantor and Gerald Myrtle-More, and after a certain episode behind a music-book, a tell-tale blush reigned upon both faces.

I was not surprised next evening, when sitting alone in my room, a copy of a current review in my hand and comfort all around, to receive a visit from my friend. Gerald came in with as grave a step as ever, but there was as strange a compound of joy and anxiety upon his face as I had ever seen. He gave my outstretched hand a grip mild in silence, and took his old station to the left of the fire.

"Fair stood the wind for France?" I hummed. "Ah, Gerald, I don't know, I am sure, what has brought those words to my lips."

"I have proved one chance, at any rate," he said, with beaming eyes, "and am on the straight road to the other. The light had dimmed again, perplexity was paramount."

"She, Millicent, has accepted you?" I said.

"Yes, subject to her father's consent."

"You will try at once to obtain that?"

"Immediately on his return from Scotland. But, old fellow, what if she is sent away in consequence?"

The same contingency had occurred to my own mind as a not unlikely one. If she really cares for you, it is only a matter of years in any case," answered; "you are both young, and time is on your side."

As it happened, I was away on the day of Captain Trantor's return, and did not reach home till midnight. A terrible shock it did give me, a terrible sequel was it to the light-hearted banter which I had indulged in the morning that the heart of Hollies Hall had been shot in his own room, and that Gerald Myrtle-More, the suitor of his daughter, stood charged with the crime.

The whole community was in a ferment, and, as in all such cases, the most absurd and exaggerated stories were about Ashdale. About the two main facts, however, of the crime and the arrest, I sorrowfully found not the shadow of a doubt. Captain Trantor had come down to Peabury by the night express of the 19th, and had arrived in the village the next morning, at eleven that evening he was in a corpse. The chain of evidence upon which Gerald Myrtle-More had been first suspected, and then imprisoned, was apparently a strong one. It had few links, but those were ugly ones. The young man, I knew myself, had expressed his determination to lose no available time in the prosecution of his suit; indeed he did not himself deny that at half-past ten that night he had been closeted with the doomed man in the very apartment of the murder. He had gone away agitated; that was sworn to on good authority. It was probable, thought I, that he had been refused and was agitated. A pistol of a peculiar pattern had been picked up some twenty yards from the house, and had been since identified as Gerald Myrtle-More's property; a fact that I will confess staggered me not a little, and very certainly looked dark. Upon these premises Inspector Roberts had thought it good policy to make sure of his prisoner.

Hollies Hall stood about a mile out of the village, on the high road to Finchester. It was a lonely house, and there were only a few laborers' cottages anywhere near. I went up there at once, and found everything in disorder and under the surveillance of the police. The widow and the careworn daughter had been mercifully taken away by the rector. The body lay for the present on a couch in the chamber of the crime. I sought the police inspector. Annoyed as I was at this moment not the least doubt either of his innocence, or of his being able to do anything, I was, however, sympathetic and fairly communicative, but it was easy to see that beneath his civil sentences lurked the conviction that he had arrested the right man.

"You see, sir," he said, "Myrtle-More was observed on his way down from the Hall by the keeper who lives at the chalk mine. Brown says he was out in his garden, smoking and dark as the night was, noticed Mr. Myrtle-More particularly. Mr. Myrtle-More passed quite close and was in a tremendous hurry, groaning and, Brown says, swearing to himself all the way, things which, when put together, seem very odd, but which generally that gentleman is a nice fellow—very. And then there's the pistol!"

"What did Ger—Mr. Myrtle-More say when you went down to Ashdale Lodge?"

"He was in bed, sir; and when I saw him he looked as pale as death; but all he said was, 'I am very sorry, Roberts. You perfectly innocent, but of course I'll go with you as usual.'"

"And innocent I am sure he is," I answered warmly; "but somebody has committed a foul crime and must be detected. You have made a thorough search, of course, indoors as well as out, and have examined the servants?"

"Every one, sir, without exception; but they are all accounted for, right enough. And, what makes it darker, Mr. Parke, harder to make out, is that that clearly wasn't thought for robbery."

"Unless the thief thought to find the room empty, and to save himself, shot Captain Trantor?"

"No, sir, no! There is not the least sign of a bullet breaking in. Beside, the pistol!"

Red-tape was bringing me mercilessly back to his fixed idea; it was horrible! A business-like thought seized me.

"I am the family solicitor, as you doubtless know," I said. "You will allow me to go to the room, and make investigations for myself?"

"Certainly, Mr. Parke; a man is on guard there all the while, of course."

"Disordered as the place had been by the events of the night, method still reigned on Captain Trantor's table and desk. There was a thin case of documents, bills and receipts, evidently brought home the day before from Scotland; probably the issue of my own latest advice had hidden there; but I had no heart to look. There were filed letters answered and unanswered. There was a mixed pile of pamphlets, political and legal. There was a county court hand-book, and the red-backed book which the unfortunate gentleman had made notes of our last meeting. I opened this, and found it to be a record of engagements and important memoranda. Brevity was its chief feature. A full half of the entries were quite unintelligible to any but the writer. Letters did duty for words, and numbers had apparently a mysterious and hurried meaning. Money was, from the first page to the last, its great burden. If I had been looking for evidences of the captain's secret money-lending business instead of for the elucidation of his life and death mystery, my search would have been amply rewarded; as it was, there was very little to interest me. Stay! What followed the memorandum of the visit to my office? Only this:—

"C. on R. H.—1030, 20th, Imp. Quarr."

In that instant I had grasped a clue.

Only a line that seemed as inscrutable as any of the others. I ran my eye hastily the remainder of the leaf—there were a few, a very few, more entries—and closed the book, baffled.

As the inspector had said, the room bore no trace of any violence preliminary to the one great crime. Neither had there been a struggle. An altercation with Gerald Myrtle-More—a death-wound. In any unprejudiced case I was bound to confess to my own judgment that, like the policemen, I should have linked the two facts together.

Gerald was imprisoned in the inspectors' own part of the village jail, and thither I went to seek him.

On the road met Mr. Markham, popularly known as the "Squire." All the old man's pomposity was shaken out of him, and he reined up his steed, with a face as grave and bewildered as my own.

"A terrible affair! a sad business, Mr. Parke," he said.

"Very mysterious to a degree."

"I really would not have believed it of young Myrtle-More."

"I don't dryly, and with an accent of indignation."

"No more does Bronne, nor I—nor I—thoroughly. We shall have to get a London detective down; I do not believe these police will unravel it."

"Roberts thinks it's plain."

"Yes; that's just the reason. Possessed by that insane idea, they will allow the real criminal to escape."

"Ah! Have you seen Myrtle-More?"

"No; I am just going there; to a jail, indeed!"

Even from so friendly an encounter as this, it was plain that the tide of suspicion was running heavily against his friend; among strangers it would be ten times worse. Sick and sad at heart, I held on my path.

Gerald was sitting bowed down at the little deal table as I entered his room. He rose to his feet and looked me fully in the face—a look that went through me like a knife, and yet had no sting in it. He gazed at me, as sadly, and as decisively, "If my father had worn the least shadow of the surrounding suspicion I believe the old bonds would have been broken between us for ever. It was otherwise; and in silence he gripped my hand with a strong convulsive grip. Then he spoke.

"I thought you would come," he said.

"How do you get on, Gerald?"

"I have not seen her. She was very self-possessed, they said for so young a girl, and under so great a shock."

"And they suspect—nay, charge—me with murdering Milly's father! They are a wise folk these police, and Markham's like the rest."

"The more you are hard and grating; it is not fair, Gerald, to take me up."

"Personally, I have no doubt what you are, Gerald, of your innocence, and I have told them so, but there are circumstances—capable of speedy explanation, of course—which, on the face of it looks black; and after all the duty of the police is duty."

"I should remember! But it is an awful ordeal, my friend; and his voice broke, as only the voice of rare, overpowering emotion can break."

Gerald shuddered before he could repress the revolt.

"Will you tell me what actually took place last night, so far as you are concerned, when you were taken to the hall?"

"Just what you can guess, just what you know would. I went up to Hollies Hall about ten, as fixed by an answer to a note soliciting an interview. I made my proposals, asked for Milly, put my case as well as I knew how, and received a 'No' given in a passion and with results. Poor fellow! I am sorry for the captain now, and I never wished him any harm;

Miss Allie P. Myrick and Miss Childs have been recommended as teachers at a salary of $325 per annum.

There are, we believe, two institutions of learning besides our own in the United States in which courses of instruction are given in "Political Science."

But so far as we have been able to ascertain, the courses given by these institutions are that adopted by the University of Michigan.

This university, although belonging to the state is practically a national institution. The permanent increase of the university is derived from a gift of the nation, and all of the facilities it affords for educational purposes are given at nominal cost irrespective of residence, nationality, or any conventionalism.

As one result of the establishment of this school, we expect to see an increase in the number of students from foreign countries as well as from various parts of the U. S.

Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly. The September number is especially noteworthy. The opening article, by George Alfred Townsend, entitled "Days of Gloom in the White House," is timely and very interesting, embodying a history of the Presidential mansion, and the most prominent incidents in connection with the attempted assassination of the President.

The article is illustrated by sixteen fine engravings. There are sketches, essays, poems, and an abundant miscellany replete with interest and valuable information.

The number is embellished with a handsome colored frontispiece, "He Won't Hurt You," from Heywood Hardy's painting. The price of a single copy is only 25 cents, and the yearly subscription $3, postage paid.

A specimen copy will be sent post-free by enclosing 25 cents to Frank Leslie's Publishing House, 53, 55 and 57 Park Place, New York.

Detroit Free Press: "A report was current on Saturday night that a young woman had died suddenly somewhere on Abbot street."

A reporter of this paper made a careful canvass of the street and found that a young woman named May Allen, who boarded on the street near Second, died of apoplexy at 12 o'clock noon. She was stricken on Friday night and lived twelve hours. Her body was sent to the home of her parents in Ann Arbor. When the reporter called at the house where she died, a gentleman came to the door and for some unknown reason professed ignorance of the matter. The neighbors were then interviewed and the truth of the report was confirmed. The reporter then returned to the house and through persistent efforts learned the abrupt facts. The gentleman was very abject and suddenly shut the door in the reporter's face."

The deceased was the daughter of Mrs. Isaac Dunn, and the divorced wife of L. B. Kellogg of this city.

The Chicago fair to be held September 12, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 17, promises in all respects to be the greatest event which ever occurred on the grounds of the Chicago driving park. Premiums to the value of $50,000 are offered. In making this premium list, every interest pertaining to agriculture, horticulture, live stock and the household, has been carefully studied and provided for in the most liberal manner, and this supplemented by an immense central or main exhibition hall for the display of agricultural and horticultural products, manufacturers of the dairy and household flowers, fabrics and women's wear, and many other branches of a great fair. This building will be lighted, ventilated, and equal in every respect to the large demands for space expected. Ample and accessible accommodations of all kinds for the exhibition of agricultural implements, machinery and vehicles; and plenty of dining-halls, restaurants and lunch counters to accommodate the public at reasonable prices. For premium lists or general information, address D. L. Hall, secretary 116 Monroe street, Chicago, Ill.

The will of the late David K. Carroll, a millionaire manufacturer, who died in Baltimore a few days ago, has been admitted to probate in the Baltimore county court, and, in one respect, is a remarkable document. After bequeathing all his property, estimated to be worth several million dollars, to his large family about equally, he places the sum of $100,000 in the hands of his executors to defend the will in case of litigation. In this connection, he says: "While I have often been filled with disgust at the efforts of children to break their parents' wills, and the wasting of the fruits of their labors in litigation, I hereby express my hope and earnest desire that my children will cheerfully accept the provisions of my will. No one of them has attempted to influence me. I had rather my property were buried in the depths of the ocean than wasted in litigation and the peace and harmony of my family destroyed in the bitterness of contention." Therefore the income of $100,000 or so much thereof, or of the principal, as may be needed, is set apart to defray any expenses reasonably incurred in defending the will or resisting any effort to break or alter any of its provisions, and the rest of the $100,000 is to be divided among such of his children or their heirs as make no attempt to break his will or resist any of its provisions. Should all acquiesce, then the $100,000 is to be thrown in with the rest, and made subject to the division.

One Way to Have Revenge.

Senator Voorhes was in Indianapolis recently and in the course of a conversation with a reporter relative to his political reminiscences, the "Tall Sycamore of the Wabash" said: "I remember when I was a young man, a good many years ago now I wrote a speech for a democratic member of the Indiana legislature. It was a d—d good speech and handled the topics of the day very ably. As an episode of the speech I made the orator attack another democratic member very vigorously. I did this purposely because I had a secret grudge against the fellow who was going to speak and wanted to see him punished. The other fellow came back at him like the devil, and completely chewed him up. My man couldn't reply at all. I knew that he couldn't as the other fellow was altogether too much for him. My man was everlastingly used up, and I got even without his ever knowing what I hurt him. But this was a good many years ago," added the senator with a sigh. "I wouldn't do a mean trick like that now."

Albert Pulcifer.

The Clinton News gives the following notice of Albert Pulcifer, whose death at Clinton was recorded in THE DEMOCRAT last week: Albert Pulcifer was born in Ann Arbor, August 24, 1851, and was consequently 30 years and 10 days old when he died. Remaining at home and attending school until he had attained a fair education in the high school, he went to Manchester in 1867 and went to work in the store of his uncle, Geo. W. Doty Esq. He remained in this work four years, and then went into the employ of John Peabody, a banker of Manchester. Mr. Pulcifer continued in this position under Mr. Peabody and his successors, Mack & Schmidt, about six months. When Alonzo Clark organized his bank in Clinton, he engaged Mr. Pulcifer as cashier, a position which he has filled ever since—about nine years.

The University.

Mortimer E. Cooley, who is to act as professor of mechanical engineering, and president Prieze, have rearranged the course of study which became necessary on account of the introduction in the university of the new branch of mechanical engineering. Several new courses of instruction will be necessary making the institution full and complete in all the essential branches usually pursued by those intending to prepare themselves for practice as civil, mechanical, or mining engineers. According to the announcement, the arrangement of the courses of study offered will be such that all engineering students will take up nearly or quite the same topics for the first two years after entering the university. For the last two years the course of study will depend upon the particular branch the student wants to pursue. The requirements for the admission are to be the same as heretofore for students in civil engineering.

Seyler, who intends sending the young man abroad after another year's study at Warren.

The new comic, discovered by Prof. Schaefer of Ann Arbor and named after its discoverer, may now be seen at any time during a clear evening. In a private letter the discoverer says: "Early in the evening it can be seen with the naked eye in the northwest, at 11 o'clock directly east, and but a few degrees from the horizon, and after midnight it will be seen to the best advantage for a few days to come."—Lansing Republican.

Cities larger than Ann Arbor have concluded to use the electric light for illuminating purposes, and we have it from good authority that if the Langley electric light company is not willing to see this city lighted, the Brush electric light company of Cleveland is ready to undertake the task. Will not the citizens move in this matter? A majority of the members of the electric light company are residents of this city and should be interested in the matter.

Commercial: Wm. M. Porter, of Detroit, was in town some days ago, looking the field over for the organization of an electric light company in this city, under the auspices of the Brush electric company, Cleveland, Ohio. The project was received with favor by quite a number. It will not be long before the paper mills and the business streets of the city will turn darkness into the glare of the noonday sun. Gas, naphtha and gasoline have only a brief future.

If the colored base-ball club of Ypsilanti had any idea they were great players they had the conceit taken out of them last Thursday by the colored club of this city, who beat them nearly two to one, the score standing 26 to 14 in favor of Ann Arbor. The colored gentlemen who hung it on their Ypsilanti brethren were Woodman, Wm. Johnson, Edward Finch, Ed Taylor, Geo. Goff, Chas. Fox, Henry Smith, Arthur Crawford and Wm. Allison. Wm. Thomas was scorer for the nine.

Observer: That important adjunct of the fire department, the bell, has been put in proper shape on the top of Davenport & Son's store, and a very ingeniously constructed arrangement it is, too. A 200 pound weight runs the clockwork, which, when wound and "let loose," by pulling a wire which is near the sidewalk at the rear of D. & Son's store, will cause a continuous ringing of the bell, for a period of four or five minutes, which surely should be long enough to arouse our people from slumber, in case of a fire.

The Cleveland Herald has a bit of interesting news. It is this: That Bookalter, of Ohio, after his nomination visited Tilden and came home with his letter of acceptance in his pocket. This Tilden is going to help Bookalter this year and next year Tilden will run for governor of New York; then if elected he will be the democratic nominee for president in 1884.

In the meantime Book. will be up for good, provided he lays out C. Foster, of Ohio. By the above, it will be seen (if true) that the barrel is fast becoming the main issue in American politics.

The circulation of THE DEMOCRAT continues to grow as witnessed the following new names since the last issue of the paper: Joseph Jacobus, Peter Long, Mrs. D. C. Winegar, Jno. Beahan, Christopher Carey, Wm. Ludolph, J. Clair, J. J. Goodyear, Geo. W. Cook, Eli W. Moore, Ann Arbor, T. C. Howard, Augusta, Samuel Handley, Scio, H. W. Rouseup, Ft. Wayne, Ind., Mrs. Neva Wheeler, Muskegon, F. Hangsterfer, Ann Arbor, Nathaniel Ryder, Salem, Wm. Bunting, Ann Arbor town, Daniel Brownell, Pittsfield, Geo. H. Nayler, Northville, Theo. J. Hicks, Deerfield.

Ypsilanti: Jamestown, Dakota, bids fair to become as noted a colony for Ypsilanti as was the Rosebud Agency under Major Newell, or as Tower City is for Salineites. Tuesday night John S. Harris, Will McCormick and John Thompson of this city, left for that place with a view to locating. Messrs. Glover and Honey, who have but just returned, bought land while there, and Messrs. J. H. and W. B. Martin are there now, the former breaking up land and the latter building a brick block. Besides these, I. B. Harris, who is the happy owner of a soldier's land warrant, expects to leave next week to take up a homestead.

Last Friday Otto Mauer, aged 9 years, and Henry Hauser, aged 14, were missing. About two o'clock Saturday morning Hauser went home and told his father that he and Mauer got on a freight train to ride to the first railroad bridge to go in swimming. The train was moving so fast they were not able to jump off or rode to Dexter. Hauser then started for home reaching here as above stated. Mauer was afraid of a whipping and would not return. Nothing has been heard from him and parties have begun a search for the boy. He was dressed in black clothes, is dark complexioned, and wore a black hat, and is about 4 feet and 3 inches in height.

WICKED FOR CLERGYMEN. Rev. —, Washington, D. C., writes: "I believe it to be all wrong and even wicked for clergymen or other public men to be led into giving testimonials to quack doctors or vile stuks and medicines, but when a really meritorious article made of valuable remedies known to all, that all physicians use and trust in daily, we should freely commend it. I therefore cheerfully and heartily commend Hop Bitters for the good they have done me and my friends, firmly believing they have no equal for family use. I will not be without them."—New York Baptist Weekly.

KIDNEY DISEASES. Kidney diseases afflict the greater part of the human race, and they are constantly on the increase, but where the virtues of Kidney-Wort are known, they are held in check and speedily cured. Let those who have had to constantly dose spirits of nitre and such stuff, give this great remedy a trial and be cured. In the dry form it is most economical, in the liquid the most convenient.—Philadelphia Press.

Let the poor sufferers from female complaints take courage and rejoice that a painless remedy has been found. We refer to Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It is prepared at 235 West Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Send to Mrs. Pinkham for pamphlets.

Keep it on hand. No farmer or teamster should be without Henry & Johnson's Arnica and Oil Liniment. It is invaluable in cases of hurts either on man or beast.

Singers and public speakers should use Down's Elixir, as it removes hoarseness and increases the power of the voice.

If you desire rosy cheeks and a fair complexion, purify the blood by the use of Baxter's Mandrake Bitters.
